

Getting a bad final grade in an important class.

Translation and Grammarly used.

1.

If I received a bad final grade in an important class, it would undoubtedly stir up my worst emotions like disappointment, frustration, or self-doubt. Developing a mindfulness routine could definitely help me process these feelings and gain insight into my thoughts, enabling me to respond to the situation with clarity and resilience.

One mindfulness practice I could do regularly is Mindful Journaling. This involves setting aside time to write about my emotions, thoughts, and physical sensations in response to the situation. Mindful Journaling aligns with the WHAT skill of Describe, as it encourages me to put my experiences into words. This way, I can objectively view my experiences without having my emotions stirring them up. For instance, I might describe my thoughts as "I feel frustrated because this grade doesn't reflect the effort I put in," or "I feel worried about how this will impact my overall GPA." By clearly naming my emotions and experiences, I can untangle them and understand them more deeply.

To make Mindful Journaling effective, I would incorporate all three HOW skills into my practice:

Nonjudgmentally: While journaling, I would write without labeling my feelings as "wrong" or

"undeserved." Instead of thinking, "I shouldn't feel so upset about this grade," I would acknowledge my emotions for what they are. For example, I might write, "It's okay to feel disappointed because this class was important to me." This approach allows me to accept my emotional state without adding unnecessary criticism or blame.

One-Mindfully: During journaling, I would give my full attention to the process. I would set aside distractions, such as my phone or other responsibilities, and focus entirely on writing and analyzing why I got a bad score. If my mind wandered to unrelated thoughts, like future classes or disappointed parents, I would gently redirect my attention back to the current exercise, ensuring that I remain fully present with my feelings.

Effectively: To practice mindfulness effectively, I would tailor my journaling to specific goals. For instance, I might focus on identifying the thoughts that are amplifying my emotional distress, such as "I'll never recover from this grade," and challenge them with more balanced perspectives, like "This grade is disappointing, but I can learn from this experience and improve my study skills." I would also use the journal to list actionable steps I can take to address the situation, such as meeting with the professor to discuss my performance or creating a study plan for future classes.

Mindful Journaling can help me recognize and validate my emotions while reflecting on my distress's underlying causes. Over time, this practice would foster increased self-awareness, allowing me to notice patterns in my thoughts, such as tendencies to catastrophize or blame myself, and replace them with more constructive approaches. So, Mindful Journaling would provide a constructive outlet for processing the emotional impact of receiving a bad grade. By focusing on Describe from the WHAT skills and applying the three HOW skills, Nonjudgmentally, One-Mindfully, and Effectively, I can develop a mindfulness routine that turns a challenging situation into an opportunity for growth and self-discovery.

2.

When I receive a bad final grade in an important class, my emotional thermometer will definitely go above 65. But to know that when it is over 65, it would mean that I am experiencing those intense emotions, such as frustration, disappointment, or self-doubt, and they are interfering with my ability to think clearly and respond effectively.